What is centrifuge? Centrifuge is a machine that is used to separate a liquid into its component parts by centripetal force. It is used for separation, purification and concentration of biomolecules such as blood, plasma, serum, and urine. When a centrifuge rotates, it pulls the liquid towards its center and separates it into its heavier component parts and its lighter component parts. It is normally used in the biotechnology industry to separate different types of biomolecules in the process of biological research, biological sample preparation and clinical diagnostics. The first centrifuge was invented in 1932 by Michael von Langsdorff. This was the first centrifuge used in clinical laboratories in the United States and is now a collector's item.
